

Bio:

JUDY WELLS was born in San Francisco and raised in Martinez, California. She received her B.A. from Stanford University and her Ph.D. in Comparative Literature from the University of California, Berkeley.

She has nine books of poetry to her credit: I Have Berkeley; Albuquerque Winter; Jane, Jane; The Part-Time Teacher; The Calling: Twentieth Century Women Artists; Everything Irish; Call Home; Little Lulu Talks with Vincent Van Gogh; and I Dream of Circus Characters: A Berkeley Chronicle. Her poetry has been reviewed in several issues of the French magazine Femmes Artistes International (Paris), edited by Laurence Moréchand-Peraer, Docteur ès Lettres.

Her essay, "Daddy's Girl," has appeared in The Borzoi College Reader (Alfred A. Knopf), and an Irish essay, "The Sheela-na-Gigs," was published in Travelers Tales Ireland. Judy is also co-editor, with Marsha Hudson, Bridget Connelly, Doris Earnshaw, and Olivia Eielson, of The Berkeley Literary Women's Revolution: Essays from Marsha's Salon (McFarland, 2005).

Judy taught creative writing, women's poetry, composition, and literature at various Bay Area colleges, before a career as an academic counselor and faculty member at Saint Mary's College of California, working with adults returning to school. Now a full-time poet, she lives with her husband, avant-garde poet Dale Jensen, in Berkeley.

WHAT WE FORGOT

"Beware, beware, Mac Conglinne, lest the gravy drown thee!
The Vision of Mac Conglinne 12th century

For 4th and 5th generation Irish-Americans

We forgot our language We forgot the land we came from had rolling green hills We forgot our songs
We forgot our stories
We forgot we were cattle people We forgot our voyage tales where the West didn't mean only Death

where the West meant Tir na n'Og
The Land of Youth where there was no decay We forgot the islands of women The land in the sea surrounded by sea horses We forgot the sea was a plain of red flowers which Manannan mac Lir thundered through in his chariot

We forgot we ever had a vision of a silly land of surfeit where we rowed on a lake of milk skimming cream where castles were made of butter and lard and our palisades, of bacon We forgot we had cheese gates and cheese stepping stones and a voracious demon who slipped inside our mouths in an apple whom a cleric called Mac Conglinne enticed from our king's gullet by enumerating all the things the demon liked to eat-- curds and whey and milk and lard and bacon and mutton and buttered rolls and mead until the demon couldn't stand it anymore and leaped from the king's throat and there were lands where you could eat a bird's egg and then sprout feathers and lands where the fragrance of crimson trees satisfied your hunger and lands where multi-colored birds blue, crimson, and green sat three in a row and sang away your grief and Yeats tried to tell us but only a little

And we tried to forget in America We wanted real bacon in our bellies and we wanted shoes and then we wanted fancy red-flowered hats and we wanted an education so we could become lawyers, and nurses and school teachers so we would not have to be domestics and serve roasted birds to “our betters” who would never sprout feathers

Never fly as we did with the knowledge of our tales over seas of red flowers
over seas of red flowers We forgot, we forgot our tales and remembered only dark seas and coffin ships We forgot our seas of red flowers and Manannan mac Lir on his steed galloping to meet us where we were Queen of the island
with 17 daughters
Queen of the island
with 17 daughters

LET'S TALK ABOUT THE FUN SIDE OF CATHOLICISM AT ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Take Father Coffey, for example.
I always thought his name was spelled with two e's until I went to Ireland.
He had a bright red balding head and a bum chipped tooth and was always smiling.
Every year he went to see his Irish spinster aunts in New York, Saw all the Broadway musicals and returned to St. Catherine's with big ideas for his new play,
 “The Song of Siena.” Then he'd sport flashy shirts and pal around with buxom Barbara Schultz, P.T.A. mom and part-time producer of “The Song of Siena.”
The whole Catholic School was in it, grades one to eight and each year it got more elaborate until we finally had a full scale musical, “OKLAHOMA”!
Dennis Watson played the hero, Louise Koller the heroine.
I don't know how she got the part except she was big and well-developed for a kid.
She didn't have to sing.
 We lip-synched the whole play.
I had a long red skirt and bonnet for a square dance number, and the guys had cowboy hats and drawstring ties.
We all wore bright red lipstick, and backstage, where we waited hours to go on,
we danced rock and roll we had learned from T.V.--

Dick Clark's American Bandstand from Philly.

We adolescent Catholics couldn't go to mixed parties-- “No boys and girls together after 6th grade,” but backstage Father Coffey didn't care, and so we whooped it up until, “O-O-O-O----klahoma, where the wind comes sweeping down the plain,” and we swept out on stage with our rickrack skirts swishing still thinking about Elvis, and we weren't Judy Wells and Mary Jo Chantri and Sal Arcato and Philip Murphy pipsqueaks in 7th and 8th grade-- We were O- K-
 L- A- H- O- M- A !
 OKLAHOMA!

91-YEAR-OLD FILLY

My mother a 91-year-old filly kicks her legs up on her bed in her expensive
Board and Care
and says, “I'm bored here.”
but she won't do anything except watch T.V.
What can I say?
It was the same
when she said, “I hate sleeping all the time,”
and in the next breath, “I just want to go to sleep.”

What can I say?
Dying by inches
is not fun, but you're more alive than you think?
When your caretakers offer you salmon and chocolate ice cream, eat it!
It could be your last meal or it could be one of a series of last suppers which go on for years.

What can I say?
I already told you "Bon Voyage" when you asked me to in the hospital,
but now you're back, many pounds lighter (unlike the usual tourist) but still yourself, sassy, depressed,
at times groping for words.
"They're inside," you say,
"but they can't come out."
The word you searched for last night was "Jeopardy"— your favorite T.V. show.

It's not just you, Mom.
My own mental health is in jeopardy.
I'm hurting inside too but I can't get the words out.
They won't roll off my tongue.
So I write this poem on my bed with pursed lips (and kapowie and kapowie inside)
so I write this poem
with lips of stone.

MISS HAVISHAM DOES NOT LIVE HERE

Today, at 899 Willow, our childhood home, my brother while cleaning out the kitchen closet, amidst old cans of Campbell's soup, saran wrap, and childhood valentines, came across the top of an ancient wedding cake in a box.
"It's mom and dad's!" he yelled.

But Mimi thought it looked familiar—compared the fluffy white-skirted little bride and the groom in tux to a photo she had of her wedding.
It was her cake top all right, 40 years old and mom had saved it.
My brother wanted to cut into Mimi's cake.
"It's still moist!" said Mel.
Then he found Nancy's wedding cake top in another box—all roses and pillars with a little vase on top for flowers.
Nancy was modern, hadn't wanted a bride and groom.
This cake was only 35 years old.

Then my brother found the pièce de résistance.
Mom and dad's wedding cake—64 years old!
"It's petrified!" I yelled, poking it, and noting the elegant 30s slim dress on the bride, the slender groom in tux.
Big sugar roses surrounded them, and beneath this top plate was a circle of dark fruit cake on another plate.
"Still good," said Nancy.

Dale took a photo of the four of us, Mimi, Nancy, Judy, and Mel, holding all the cakes, representing something like 140 years of marriage.
Only I have escaped this fate though I thought later after the camera's flash, I'd like that elegant 30s bride and groom on my and Dale's wedding cake one day.

“Something old, something new, something borrowed, something blue.”
They were old all right, They'd be borrowed.
As for new and blue—we'd have to get something else, unless the mold begins to grow on that dark fruit cake—Then we'd have everything.

THE MATISSE T-SHIRT

I saw it in a catalogue advertising chic artistic things to wear—a Matisse Jazz t-shirt 100% cotton in true Matisse blue
Icarus falling soundlessly through space so said the ad—

But when I pulled it from its package and over my chest all I could hear were sounds—gunfire, brilliant shattered stars of yellow

One direct hit—
The red dot on Icarus' heart His black body falling ` a crucifix through Matisse's true blue jazz sky and the sounds were so loud I knew I could not wear this image blazed on my chest

Not here in Oakland
Not here in Berkeley Not here in Richmond where gunfire rings out in the night cross-fire at dawn

and Black Icarus lies in a pool of brilliant red day
after day
after day

After Matisse's Icarus, from Jazz, Paris, 1947

SUPERMARKET LOVE

Last week at Whole Foods as I was reaching into the refrigerated shelves for the coldest tofu with the most future expiration date a yellow gloved hand
from the other side
laid itself on mine.

I nearly jumped a mile.
“Oh sorry!” said a woman's voice from the other side.
A man behind me laughed.

This week as I walked by the same tofu section I heard a disembodied voice from the other side say, “*I needed you,
and you have never been there for me once.*” “Yes, I have,”
I wanted to protest.
“Last week!”
